penrance of those used on Salurday. They were stated to have used up a number of pencil carbons during M. Werdermann's protracted investigation-and experiments, but they were only marked by a few spots where the positives embons had impinged upon them. There were ten of these lauros tested on Saturday in one circuit. The machine used for supplying the current

f electricity to them was a small Gramme continuous muchine such as is ordinarily used for electro-plating. It was stated to be capable of producing an electro-motive force of about four Daniell cells, the intensity, therefore, being low, but the quantity large. The machine was driven through belting by a small ongine used to drive some of the mathine tools in the company's fitthe machine to the row of lamps, and from it ten wires were led up; one to each lamp, resembling in its arrangement a gas main with its suppipes. The current produced by the machine is let slong the main cable and through the supply branches to the lamps, passing through the positive earbon of each, and then through the disc or negative carbon, and so away by a return calle back to the machine. Although constructed upon a practical scale, the lamps are more or less experimental, being the first M. Werdermann has made. They, however, illustrated the principle exceedingly well, giving a steady though small light of very good colour and of moderate intensity. The divisibility of number of lamps in the series without affecting the remainder, except to increase their intensity. lamp which M. Wordermann has designed for periments of Saturday went its working was very satisfactory. During the experiments two lamps: of similar construction, but of large size, were tried with equally satisfactory results. With regard to the cost of producing the light and the photometric value of the light itself we can say nothing, inasmuch at the machine was driven from an engine of far bigher power than it would of itself require, and there were no means of ascertaining the value of the light photometrically. In comparison with the ordinary remine conditions. We should add that the Wordermann light is being introduced by bard-street, London.
